In particular we wish to understand the origins of the solar system, and the evolution of Jupiter and other giant planets. The details of the evolution of the stars and their planets in our own solar system depend on the details of how gas is spread across different parts of the galaxy. A fully detailed treatment of the evolution of the galaxy requires knowing the equation of state and thermodynamic properties of all the materials that can be found in the Milky Way. We can learn about the thermodynamics of many compounds by studying the effect of temperature on the properties of known materials. For example, we have strong evidence that the sun is composed of hydrogen and helium. We can learn about the thermodynamic state of these components by measuring how they behave when the temperature is changed. As we do so, we have full experimental control over the temperature. We can thus learn about the behavior of the gas at different temperatures. We can also see how the properties of the gas change as the temperature is increased. Similarly, we can learn about the composition of the gas in our galaxy by examining the behavior of the same gas at different temperatures. We have experimental control over the temperature. We can thus measure the properties of the gas at different temperatures. For example, we can learn about the composition of the gas in our galaxy by examining the behavior of the same gas at different temperatures.
