In a study conducted by Uzun et al., a strong positive correlation between quantitative sensory testing and SFN has been demonstrated; however, the patients have been diagnosed with polyneuropathy in their study\[[@ref31]\] which may have been the reason for the high discrepancy with the current study. In this study, the patients have been divided into two groups based on the pre-operative values of Sural Conduction velocity (SCV) recorded on dorsalis plantar (DP) and dorsalis pedis (DP) nerves (in our study, both nerves were considered in this criterion as it is reported in the literature that the conduction is not affected by age when the SCV is higher than 30 m/sec)\[[@ref32][@ref33]\] and did not show any significant difference in terms of neuropathic symptoms and other parameters among the groups. This might be explained by the fact that the majority of the patients had conduction disturbance only in one leg and therefore the electrophysiological status of the leg with worst nerve conduction velocities at the level of the hip was not influenced by the symmetrical or asymmetrical presentation of the neuropathy. However, all the study groups showed significant improvement in various parameters after surgery with significant differences in motor and sensory parameters and the mean duration of surgery, with the exception of improvement in sensory parameters in group D. In group A, there was a non-significant reduction in motor and sensory parameters in the affected side with an increase in motor parameters in the unaffected side, which might be due to the fact that
